Aoun, the leader of the Free Patriotic Movement, agreed to led the March 8's political list, despite his long split with Maronite leader Michel Aoun, whose FPM has repeatedly celebrated Azar's inclusion, which is seen as proof of Aoun's involvement in providing support to Azar.

On April 16, the Sean track, from Lebanon's oversees, is a perfect stunt for the Lebanese Senate. Lebanon's Senate on Monday overlooked an important constitutional resolution, one that would have been expected in the next session, by a 33 to 1 vote. The decision, which was made by 11 senators, some of them from the Maronite Christian Party, was seen by some observers as an attempt to block the opposition's efforts to hold a referendum on the use of women's suffrage in the upcoming election. The Senate vote came after a heated debate among senators, with some calling for a referendum and others opposing it. The decision was seen as a victory for the government, which has been tried for a referendum since the last election in 2005.

The observers of the March 14 party in Lebanon, which is called the March 14, are expected to lift their boycott of the April election, which was held in March. The observers, who are mainly Christian, have been boycotting the election since the last one in 2005, calling for a referendum on the use of women's suffrage.
